Web Description

In 1920, Wyeth purchased a sea captain's house in Port Clyde, Maine; by late in the decade, he found in the coastal scenery and the hearty fisherman renewed inspiration for his personal, non-commissioned work. Here in this view of the harbor at Port Clyde, Wyeth used a skewed perspective, an exaggerated roll of the hills and a bright palette to cast a modernist sheen over a setting that was far removed from "modern"—the industrial or urban scene.
